How Paraeducators Help Students Achieve
“The range and flexibility of paraeducator positions make it difficult for most folks to understand exactly where our role begins and ends.

We are the mortar that fits where it needs to fit to keep the whole structure together.”

The mission of every public school district is to develop and implement goals that will create an education environment which enhances student achievement. This mission cannot be achieved without the contributions and accomplishments of paraeducators. As public schools come under greater pressure to meet standards and demonstrate higher student performance, teachers are being forced to focus more on curriculum and student test preparation. In response to this pressure, Education Support Professionals (ESP) paraeducators are assuming greater responsibility for supporting students in the classroom and the school environment.

These increased challenges have redefined paraeducators’ jobs. These ESPs perform duties and tasks far beyond the narrow limits and definitions of their traditional job descriptions. In addition to assisting teachers, paraeducators are critical in many situations during the school day, such as mediating disputes, communicating between administration and parents or parents and school staff, and ensuring student safety.

When asked what is important to them in their daily work (apart from student achievement), paraeducators identify four objectives:

- Recognition of the vital role they play
- Respect for their professionalism
- Job security
- Equitable pay

One way to help achieve these outcomes is to develop job descriptions that are accurate and complete and that reflect the full range of ways paraeducators contribute to the overall mission of the school district and the community.

A new approach—a results-oriented job description (ROJD)—can provide clear job expectations for the paraeducator and for his or her supervisor.

This manual outlines the process by which these new job descriptions can be written. The process benefits more than just the individual paraeducator; it also strengthens the local Association and creates new understanding in the community of the role paraeducators play in building quality public education.

“I keep hoping that someone will take a sanity break and realize that paraprofessionals are dedicated PROFESSIONALS, a well-trained group of people who do a fantastic job for our kids every day. What we need are more resources, better in-service training (aimed at paras, not teacher-tag-alongs), much more professional development, much higher salaries, and more respect!”
Who Are Paraeducators?

Paraeducators wear many hats. They are:
- Instructional and Noninstructional Assistants
- Teachers Aides and Program Aides
- Library Aides, Technicians, and Assistants
- Preschool Care Givers
- Building, Bus, and Playground Monitors
- Crossing Guards
- Nonmanagerial Supervisors

Paraeducators in the schools

More than 700,000 paraeducators work in the nation’s public schools. As the largest of NEA’s nine ESP job groups, they make up 46 percent of the K-12 ESP membership and a third of the U.S. K-12 ESP workforce.

Sixty-three percent of paraeducators work directly with pre-kindergarten or elementary level students. Close to three-quarters work with special education students. Approximately 18 percent work in bilingual programs and about 38 percent in programs directly supported by Title I federal funds. Eighty-one percent work full time, and 63 percent are paid on an hourly basis. Their average annual salary is less than $16,000.

Many paraeducators are actively involved in professional development or higher education. Thirty-eight percent plan to earn an advanced degree within the next four years. Twelve percent are currently attending school or college, and 85 percent have attended professional development training in the past two years.
Paraeducators in the community

Roughly 75 percent of paraeducators live in the communities where they work. They are active community members, participating in religious organizations, clubs, the PTA, band or sports booster groups, and community safety organizations like volunteer fire departments. Eighty-five percent volunteer on a regular basis; 65 percent volunteer to work directly with children. Many paraeducators voluntarily assume the responsibility of strengthening contact with parents. They often speak the language of the students and can serve as a liaison between the school and non-English speaking parents.
What Is A Job Description?

A job description is a formalized statement of the qualifications and duties of a job. Job descriptions clarify who is responsible for certain tasks and help the employee understand the specific responsibilities of the position. They may include information on working conditions, equipment used, knowledge and skills needed to do the job, and relationships with other positions and employees.

Currently, job descriptions for many paraeducators, if they exist at all, are inaccurate and written without employee involvement. They are often nothing more that a “posting notice” for hiring, or a document used by supervisors as part of disciplinary procedures.

Of those paraeducators who have a job description, 54 percent believe that it does not accurately describe the amount of work they do, and 27 percent think it does not accurately describe what they do. Forty-three percent of paraeducators have no say about their job descriptions, and one quarter have no job description at all!

What Is A Results-Oriented Job Description (ROJD)?

A results-oriented job description (ROJD) does more than describe what a paraeducator does (the tasks). It also describes what the paraeducator accomplishes (the results). Administrations, supervisors, employees, parents, and the entire community can recognize success when it’s defined in terms of potential outcomes. The ROJD identifies for employees and supervisors how the duties or tasks required of a job improve student achievement. It builds the connection between the paraeducator’s work and the mission of the school. And by focusing a job description on the results of the work, the community can understand and appreciate what the paraeducator does. By using results-oriented job descriptions to describe the accomplishments of paraeducator, the Association can highlight the importance of the paraeducators’ role in enhancing student achievement and advocate for accurate and meaningful job evaluations, a fair wage and salary structure, and relevant professional development for employees.

Traditional Job Descriptions and Results-Oriented Job Descriptions: What’s the Difference?

Traditional job descriptions written by supervisors and administrators are usually oriented towards “behaving well on the job,” emphasizing only those competencies and qualifications necessary to “do the job.” Supervisors and administrators rarely do the kind of careful analysis necessary to write an accurate, relevant, and up-to-date job description. They must be made aware of changes in the work, the reality of the work, and the evolution of that job.

A traditional job description states tasks to be done such as, “provide a secure environment for students and staff.” Any campus monitor can attest that there’s much more to that “task” than meets the eye. It involves maintaining order in the hallways, assisting staff and law enforcement officers, identifying physical hazards that endanger students and staff, and many other actions. A job description that calls for a campus monitor to merely “provide a secure environment” is incomplete.

A results-oriented job description, on the other hand, is comprehensive and all-inclusive. It accurately reflects who paraeducators really are and what they really do. The ROJD...
is positive, active, and provides for career growth.

is free of employee discipline and behavior references.

builds the bridge between job descriptions and job evaluations.

defines the evolution of job performance.

provides the vehicle for meaningful and appropriate professional development.

is a key way for the member, the local, the administration and the community to focus on and succeed at “enhancing student achievement.”

Why Should the Local Association Advocate for Results-Oriented Job Descriptions?

The Results-Oriented Job Description approach strengthens the local by creating an atmosphere of advocacy for the members. When attention is paid to how jobs are defined and how employees are evaluated, the local can be more inclusive and the members can be more successful in their jobs.

The ROJD process...

is positive and proactive.

benefits every member.

enhances job security.

shows members the Association is working for them.
Membership Development Program

An ROJD Action Plan for the local is separate from negotiations and maintenance. It requires planning and long-range activity. The local association’s ROJD Committee conducts one-on-one interviews with every paraeducator in the district. The local develops, implements, communicates, and drives the program for the membership.

Anti-Privatization Action Plan

When employees become identified and personalized and the daily work they do is recognized, it is difficult for the board to marginalize or trivialize them, or privatize their jobs. Job security is greatly enhanced through contact, recognition, and definition of each and every person who works in the school district.

Negotiations Support Program

A local association that has accurate information about every job in the unit is in a stronger position when it comes to bargaining new contract provisions for ESP.
BENEFITS OF RESULTS-ORIENTED JOB DESCRIPTIONS

For Members
- Create a strong professional identity
- Provide for improved communication between employees and supervisors
- Encourage the formation of appropriate professional development programs
- Increase job security

For Local Associations
- Provide an opportunity to create and enhance dialogue with the administration, the school board, and the community about the need for clear job responsibilities for paraeducators
- Produce concrete evidence of the value of paraeducators’ work when Associations advocate for improved salary, benefits, and working conditions
- Help teachers and other ESP better understand the critical role paraeducators play in educating students

For the Community
- Create understanding throughout the system and the broader community about the value of the work accomplished by paraeducators
- Enhance the work identity and professionalism of paraeducators
- Stimulate discussion about the critical role paraeducators have in improving student achievement
THE ROJD PROCESS

A results-oriented job description is built in several steps. The sequence of these steps is critical to the success of the process. The steps are illustrated below. Step 1 is the foundation and the subsequent steps build to the result.

Locate and Label Positions

Locate and label all jobs being done that have existing designated titles. These titles may exist in a variety of locations—for example, the board policy book, the personnel office, interdepartmental files, and, in a bargaining local, in the recognition article of a negotiated contract. In some locals, even very sophisticated ones, some jobs may exist that have no title at all. Recognizing each and every job—and listing it—is very important.

STEP #1
LIST THE TASKS

Once all jobs have been listed, then the first step is to develop a Tasks List for each of them. In a traditional job description, qualifications and tasks are often described together. That is often the extent of the employee’s job description because that is all the school district understands or recognizes about the job.

The task list should include all work, activities, and services performed. Add services and additional work that are not contained in the current job description.

For example, a task list for an instructional assistant might include:
Arrange chairs and other classroom furniture
Ready classroom supplies, e.g., cutting, laminating, copying
Set up classroom for special activities
Refill soap and towel dispensers
Decorate bulletin boards
Change children’s artwork
Decorate rooms according to season or upcoming holidays

NOTE: The qualifications necessary to be hired for a specific job should always be listed separately.

STEP #2
DEFINE ESSENTIAL RESPONSIBILITIES

When Step #1—the tasks list and a separate qualifications list—is complete for each and every paraeducator job within the district, then Step #2 can begin.

An Essential Responsibility is the result to be accomplished by the tasks performed.

“Essential Responsibility” is a heading that describes an area of work that usually requires several individual tasks to complete. Once various headings are developed that describe required results, the tasks can be sorted logically under the appropriate essential responsibility. A particular job may have many or few essential responsibilities.

The second step shifts the focus of the work to the result desired. The ROJD states clearly what the tasks of a specific job are, and then places the focus of the job description on the result to be accomplished—why the work is being done. When we change the focus of the job description, move from the passive to the active, which clarifies and elevates the job function.

For example, an Essential Responsibility for an Instructional Assistant may be:

SET UP CLASSROOM FOR DAILY ACTIVITIES

Now take the task list and change all the passive verbs (arrange, ready, set up, refill, decorate, etc.) to active verbs by adding the active ending, “ING.” The verbs then become arranging, readying, setting up, refilling, decorating, etc.

Changing verbs from passive to active shows that the essential responsibility involves much more work and results in more accomplishment for the students and staff of a school than was previously recognized.

An instructional assistant doesn’t just set up a classroom. He/she is responsible for:

- Arranging chairs and other classroom furniture
- Readying classroom supplies, e.g., cutting, laminating, copying
- Setting up classroom for special activities
- Refilling soap and towel dispensers
- Decorating bulletin boards
- Changing children’s artwork
- Decorating rooms according to season or upcoming holidays
The Writing Method for a ROJD

Describing jobs with the focus on results is not just an empty exercise that increases workload. It’s an important tool in the paraeducators’ quest for recognition. When the results of work are clearly written and defined, everyone in the process comes to know why the work is being done and finally recognizes and defines ALL the work that DOES get done.

The method of writing the Essential Responsibility involves the use of the connector word, BY.

1. List the ESSENTIAL RESPONSIBILITY.
2. Add the connector word—BY.
3. And then list the TASKS, using the active ending -ING.

EXAMPLE (INSTRUCTIONAL ASSISTANT):

1. ESSENTIAL RESPONSIBILITY
   SET UP CLASSROOM FOR DAILY ACTIVITIES
2. BY
3. TASKS:
   - Arranging chairs and other classroom furniture
   - Readying classroom supplies, e.g., cutting, laminating, copying
   - Setting up classroom for special activities
   - Refilling soap and towel dispensers
   - Decoratiing bulletin boards
   - Changing children’s artwork
   - Decoratiing rooms according to season or upcoming holidays
STEP #2 IN A NUTSHELL

1. Using the completed task list, determine what the broader essential responsibilities would be and then list them.

2. Add the active ending “ING” to the passive verbs in the task list.

3. Attach appropriate tasks to essential responsibilities.

4. Use the connector word “BY” to actually connect the tasks to the essential responsibilities, clearly labeling the results accomplished.

5. The focus of the job description has now changed from the PASSIVE—tasks performed—to the ACTIVE—results accomplished.

To distinguish between the TASKS to be performed and the RESULT ACCOMPLISHED, answer these questions:

- “Why are we doing this job?” (THE RESULT.)
- “What must actually be done to produce the desired result?” (THE TASKS.)

Writing a results-oriented job description using the prescribed method almost guarantees a shift of focus and enhancement of purpose for every job described. When you actually write the ROJD, print the results to be accomplished in boldface letters to emphasize the statement.

The employee, the supervisor, and the community can now recognize the connection between the work being performed daily and the employee’s specific contribution to the mission of the school community, that is, enhanced student achievement.
STEP #3
IDENTIFY THE JOB PURPOSE:
Enhancing Student Achievement

The job purpose is the goal of the entire school district. The purpose of the work done by all paraeducators is “enhancing student achievement,” which is the same purpose for all education employees in a public school district. Each paraeducator enhances student achievement by a combination of essential responsibilities, which can be defined by one broad, all encompassing phrase, such as “assisting the classroom teacher with student instruction,” in the case of the instructional assistant.

STEP #4
ENTER THE JOB TITLE

Job titles are usually already established, and are easily accessible from many sources, such as the board policy book, inter-departmental files, any existing negotiated contract, or in the personnel office. It should be noted, however, that it is always important to reference member employee lists in the event that an ESP person is working in a job that in fact is not titled.

STEP #5
ENTER THE JOB CATEGORY: Paraeducator

When Step #5 is written, the Results-Oriented Job Description is complete.
Sample Results-Oriented Job Descriptions for Paraeducators

In the Lakota School District, West Chester, Ohio, a committee writing and implementing Results-Oriented Job Descriptions recognized and defined a list of 602 different tasks and skills for Instructional Paraeducators. In doing so, they created what they considered to be a meaningful and accurate description of the work an Instructional Assistant actually does.

It is the first of the following four sample Results-Oriented Job Descriptions. Each sample shows what a paraeducator ROJD might look like. They demonstrate the ROJD writing method and the difference between an ROJD and a traditional job description.
